C-17 partners

204th stands with 535th

By Kirsten Tacker Kukini Photojournalist

The 204th Airlift Squadron is equipped with C-130 H2/H3 Hercules tactical aircraft, but when the last C-130 departs from Hickam they'll be operating a much larger aircraft.

As part of Hickam's total force, this Guard unit is presently converting into a C-17 associate unit to its active duty counterpart, the 535th Airlift Squadron.

All crewmembers of the 204th AS went to Altus Air Force Base, Okla., where all C-17 training is done for pilots and loadmasters.

"Our crew still has training they have to do," said Lt. Col. Stephen Su'a-Filo, 204th AS commander. "They will fly to other units on the mainland, Jackson Air Force Base, McChord Air Force Base and go on trips with their units.

This training tactic is what is termed as interfly. This is something the 204th will continue to do to maintain and increase their skill level until Hickam's first C-17 arrives.

"One of the unique things about our unit versus the 535th AS is the 535th already seasoned C-17 crewmembers coming in here," said Maj. Robert Chow Hoy, 204th AS. "With us all our experience is the C-130. We are trying to learn a new aircraft as well as gain the experience.

"So when the first C-17 does get here we will be able to operate as a stand-alone

"The mission of the squadron is similar to the 535th AS," said Colonel Su'a-Filo. "We provide global airlift support worldwide and to the state of Hawaii, because we are a Guard unit. We provide fully qualified aircrews to augment in any contingency or whatever we may be called up to do."

"It is truly an experience and every mission is different, said Senior Airman Randy Yamada, 204th AS. "It is amazing that I'm capable of doing something like this. There is so much you can to us," said Colonel Su'a-Filo. "However, what the 204th brings to this C-17 squadron is stability. Yes, we are not experienced in the airplane, but you come back in five years we're going to have the experience. We've already established ourselves as an outstanding unit."

Even though the 204th works side by side with an active-duty unit and operationally they are unified to get the mission done, the 204th falls administratively by the state while active duty falls under the Federal government.

"I think as long as you have Guard being state, you will always have a separation," said Colonel Su'a-Filo. "From my perspective it is going well. If there are any issues we sit down and talk. We meet once a week to go over building issues. If we have issues, we try to work them out side-by-side or we run them up the chain of command.

"So far everything that I have seen has been very positive," he continued. "At least on a day-to-day basis on the squadron level their leadership has been very helpful and very supportive of the things that have come our way. I think we've been very supportive on our side also."

In a time where resources need to be managed creatively, budgets might be cut and the demand for defense and security are constantly on the rise, it appears that the combined relationship of active duty and Guard seems to be an "The C-17 airplane is new indispensable future trend.

15th MOS 100 percent for first C-17 arrival

By Kirsten Tacker Kukini Photojournalist

As part of Hickam's new future total force, the 15th Maintenance Operations Squadron resides in the Consolidated Maintenance Complex.

Falling under the newly formed 15th Maintenance Group, the 15th MOS was officially activated June 23, asserting an overall mission of airlift throughout the

As well as preparing for the arrival of the C-17's, executing their mission includes effectively integrating active duty, Air National Guard, civilians and Boeing representatives, all a part of the 15th MOS.

"There is no other organization like this anywhere in the Air Force or anywhere in the country," said Col. Larry Stephens, 15th MXG. "It is a whole new concept. Literally 40 percent of the 15th MXG is Hawaii Air National Guard."

Their innovative partnership combines experience, effort and resource availability within this newly developing team as they await the first C-17.

The biggest change for Hickam with the C-17 is realizing that there is actually a maintenance function," said Senior Master Sgt. Jeff Moore, 15th MOS. "That is Colonel Stevens' goal to make sure that everyone is aware that there is a maintenance group out there now."

The newly merged maintenance group established their procedures and methods by visiting other Air Force bases. Data was compiled on how other bases organized their maintenance

"All of this is tedious, because normally when you come to a base its all there," said Sergeant Moore. "Now, we are starting from scratch. We are using Charleston Air Force Base, McChord Air Force Base, and McGuire Air Force Base by obtaining information they have and merging it all into one, to where it will work here at Hickam."

Using all the information that was compiled from the different Air Force bases, the new maintenance unit outlined the best of that information in preparation for the C-17.

"We stood up earlier this summer," said Sergeant Moore. "We are looking very good at being 100 percent for aircraft. Utilizing all of our programs, policies, procedures, personnel and training, we're all gearing up for the first aircraft arrival sometime in February."

Recently they geared up for the loaner C-17's that arrived in December for the 15th MOS to practice and correct any foreseeable errors.

"Practicing on the loaner C-17's, we were able to see what we need to improve upon," said Sergeant Moore.

Prior to the arrival of the loaner aircraft more than 290 people in the MOS were sent out to mainland schools on other bases to ascertain C-17 qualifica-

"They stayed down there for months and came back qualified people," said

Sergeant Moore. "Now we just need to make sure and sign them off on their final qualifications form."

Trials, tribulations, and training aside, this partnership sets an unfamiliar precedence and is an extensive investment in Hickam's future.

This is the first time there has ever been a mix like this of active duty and Guard," said Sergeant Moore. "The main obstacle to overcome is the differences between the active duty and the Guard. From the start I think we've pushed the molding of togetherness, requiring each office to have a Guard person and an active duty per-

Combining Guard and active duty will not be easy, since each branch has different protocols for operations. Their hope is this new total force of unified active duty and Guard is undetectable out on the flight line.

"It will be transparent on the flight line," said Sergeant Moore. "You will not know the difference, regardless of the paperwork procedures that Guard has to do differently from active duty. We will be one happy family.'

A happy hustling family once all the C-17's arrive here on Hickam.

"This is probably going to be the busiest airlift mission in the whole Pacific, because of its strategic location," concluded Sergeant Moore. "Everyone knows that Hickam is the Staff Sgt. Stanley Price and Tech. Sgt. Michael Evans, halfway point between the mainland and the rest of the Pacific."
